Course Description

This course is a seminar/survey course on victimization in the United States. Emphasis is placed upon the impact of victimization upon the victims and society. In addition, the response of the criminal justice system and of society to these victimizations will be explored. Theories of crime prevention and victimization will be discussed throughout the semester to encourage students to analytically consider the factors which cause victimization, and which factors can possibly prevent victimizations from occurring.

Content Warning

The content of this course, particularly the content in Week 3, will include topics that are difficult for some people to confront or discuss. In preparation for this class, students are encouraged to consider personal connections they have to these topics and think about how they may be affected. Personal connections could be triggering to some and cause intrusive thoughts, images, or anxiety. Students may also experience secondary-trauma, which is a normal reaction to engaging in violent topics. Symptoms look similar to trauma symptoms and may include a change in worldview or sense of safety. We emphasize the importance of self-care and suggest students think about the ways they currently care for their emotional, mental, physical and spiritual self. Students may benefit from intentionally including these strategies in their daily lives during the duration of the course. For a further list of off-campus resources to utilize, please visit the Franklin University Advocacy and Resource Guide.

Course Outcomes

Upon successful completion of this course, students will be able to:

1. Analyze theories of victimization.
2. Assess the current response of the criminal justice system to crime victims.
3. Analyze issues specific to different types of criminal victimization.
